Most Slovaks are annoyed about the state's inability to prevent development firms in their illegal devastation of the environment. This is the outcome of a representative survey conducted by the Institute for Public Opinion (IVO). Over a half of all people are vexed about the state's inability to prevent developers in illegal tree felling, demolitions of historical buildings and devastation of the environment. "55% of the respondents expressed their dissatisfaction about this fact," said IVO's Olga Gyárfášová. A quarter of the respondents were not worried about this behavior, 11% had not noticed it and 9% were not able to answer. "People with higher education and the residents of Bratislava, Košice and Žilina regions expressed their dissatisfaction to a much larger degree," Gyárfášová added.
