The state should support people as well as companies to provide thermal insulation in private and public buildings. According to Prime Minister Robert Fico, the Council for Economic Crisis will discuss a complex state programme to make thermal insulation in buildings more attractive at its meeting next week. "We want to introduce to the Slovak public a sufficiently visible state programme aimed at supporting natural and legal persons interested in the thermal insulation of private and public buildings," said the Prime Minister. According to him, the support for thermal insulation should have three positive effects. It would help support the production of thermal insulation materials, bring energy savings and support employment in companies. "These three goals are logical," said Fico.
